Embalmers discover strange, rubbery 'worms' in the bodies of those who were jabbed

Jane Ruby spoke with embalmer Richard Hirschman for the Stew Peters Show on Thursday about "strange, rubbery" plugs found in the veins of deceased Americans. Hirschman took a series of photos of the "worms," which were shown during the interview.

Many vaccinated people who end up on Hirschman's cutting table have died of a heart attack or stroke. He took long, fibrous cords from one of the bodies. The red part looks like a normal blood clot, but the white, fibrous material was not normal, Hirschman said.

The embalmer said that a blood clot normally breaks easily when touched. "But these white things are quite strong," he explained. "It's very flexible, it's very tough. It's not normal."

"I've been in touch with colleagues, and they see the same thing," he told Ruby. Hirschman added that the number of people with these types of "worms" has increased by 50 to almost 80 percent recently. "I'm very worried about the future."

Hirschman is now trying to figure out what the material consists of. "My gut tells me it's caused by the vaccine. I can't prove that, but if this is caused by the vaccine, imagine how many people will die in the future," he said.

"If this tissue ends up in your brain, you'll have a stroke. If it gets into your heart, you'll have a heart attack. People need to know this," he emphasized.

When asked how often he encounters these mysterious cords, he replied, "In 20-24 of the 35 people I've embalmed this month."
